

About the Authors

Jessica M. Kahn, PhD, LMSW, is an associate professor of social work and MSW program adviser at Lehman College, City University of New York, in the Bronx. She previously attended Davidson College, Washington University in St. Louis, and Columbia University. In direct practice and social work administration, Dr. Kahn primarily worked at agencies with vulnerable children and families. In that capacity, Dr. Kahn saw the need for better child and family welfare policies, including more progressive approaches to poverty reduction, parental leave, and early education and care. Professor Kahn teaches policy, research, and fieldwork courses with a focus on social and economic justice.

Joy P. Greenberg, PhD, LMSW, is an associate professor of social work and the MSW program director at Lehman College, City University of New York. Before receiving her doctorate in 2007 from Columbia University School of Social Work, she facilitated groups for new parents and caregivers. Her research areas of interest include early childhood education and care policy, immigrants and education, and school social work in the urban environment. She teaches social welfare policy, research methods, social work administration, and an elective titled Social Work in Urban Schools.
